Thursday, June 21, 2012
9:00am – 10:30am PLENARY	Innovation, Evidence-based Practices, and the Radical Transformation Needed in Nursing Education This session will address the changing factors that influence the development and implementation of nursing education programs, as well as, the implications of those changes. As nurse educators we must reflect on the way we design curricula, facilitate learning, assess what students have learned and how they have grown as individuals and professionals. Further, we must evaluate the success of our academic programs, prepare faculty for the multiple dimensions of their role, and create partnerships with colleagues in nursing and other health professions. We can no longer accept "the way we've always done it" or that the simple transition to online learning environments is enough to radically transform what we do. Instead, we must think in new ways, re-examine student-teacher relationships, expect that our teaching practices are evidence-based, and challenge traditional concepts like credits, pre-requisites, clinical rotations, "in-seat" time and clinical hours, among others. This presentation is designed to challenge these and other "sacred cows" so that we can be prepared for and, indeed, take full advantage of changing times and demographics.	Theresa M. "Terry" Valiga, EdD, RN, ANEF, FAAN Clinical Professor, Duke University School of Nursing 	C26
